WARSAW--Folks here know they can fetch their fish and their barber from the Black River.

On lazy days, such as this one, when the weather is warm and the sun glows a dim yellow, they find the Rev. John H. Alford fishing. Sometimes, Alford admits, he runs a little late because he will tarry a bit too long on the river .

But usually, like today, he is on time.

"If I can't go fishing, I work in my yard and garden," Alford says while standing near his barbershop.

He is cleaning fish now, though. Scales are flying everywhere. Cats are keeping vigil at his heels. And as he wipes away specks of fish scales from his nose, he tosses the last of the cleaned fish into a rubber container .

Alford, a 72-year-old retired preacher, aspired to be a professional barber after fathering all boy children.

"I wasn't able to get them haircuts, so I cut their hair myself," Alford says.

In 1942, he began cutting hair beneath an oak tree with hand clippers. His price was only 75 cents a head when he began working full time after getting his barber's license in the late 1950s.

"I've always hated high prices so bad," Alford says and begins walking toward his barbershop. Once inside, he washes the fish scales and the smell from his hands, and takes off his coat. He is wearing his white barber's jacket, and he checks it for scales.

Fishing and cutting hair have been given bigger chunks of his time since he retired from the ministry in 1993. Alford, who received his minister's license in 1971, didn't want to stop preaching. But hearing loss made him cut short his career in the pulpit.

"People would be testifying, and I would say, , What? What did you say ,'" he says and laughs.

Conversation in this barbershop, located about five miles north of Andrews, is usually very loud so Alford can hear. Booming voices echo across the room while Alford snips and cuts the hair of his customers, sitting in the red leather chair .

Many of his customers have known him for most or their lives, and appreciate his wonderful work. For $5, he cuts their hair the way they want it. People who come inside the brown trailer are assured they will get their hair done right. If not, the haircut is free.

The only dissatisfied customer Alford could recall was a mother who hated her son's haircut--although her son loved it. That story reminds him of others. So, he begins telling more as he waits for customers.

Among the stories he shares is one involving the death of a son killed in a freak accident. Mitchell was 8 years old in 1965 when he was hit in the head by a tire that came off a log truck.

"Mary (his 70-year-old wife of 50 years) was a singer's singer all of her life." Alford says. "But when Mitchell died, she lost her voice." Those memories cause the sparkle in his eyes to disappear, and his face becomes solemn. But moments later, his demeanor changes and a smile comes.

"No matter what happens to me, I can lean on the Lord pretty good," says Alford, who worked as a pastor for about 24 years.

Finally after several short stories about how his wife "tore up three new cars," his first customer arrives. Steve "Pat" Smith, 47, plops into the red barber's chair patched with strips of colored tape.

Shortly after getting started on Smith, Simp Price arrives. "He's the best we've got," Price, 79, says.

"What did you say?" Alford asks while brushing away the hair from Smith's shoulders.

"I said, 'You're the best we've got,'" Price repeats a little louder. Smith smiles wide and then motions for Price to get out of the brown chair and come sit in the red one. As Alford clips short strands of Price's gray hair, he reminds him to keep still. Price laughs and keeps talking.

Behind them is Alford's handy calendar that doubles as a detailed logging book. Each day, he keeps track of how many customers he has and how much money he makes. More money could be made, Alford concedes with a head shake, if he could master one fault in his otherwise polished skills.

"I've never been a fast barber," Alford says while tapping his black loafers on the floor. "That has always been my trouble." Price nods in agreement.
