Both papers are undated, but I place them as from 1793; in that year May 23 fell on a Thursday (according to a table I consulted in Whitaker's ALMANAC) and Etheldred Taylor of Franklin County is mentioned in the court records as deceased. A reading of the minutes of the Franklin County Court of Pleas and Quarter Sessions revealed no mention of or reference to this poisoning case. However, only the regular March, June, September, and December sessions are reported, and this case appears to have been a special proceeding, handled by local justices and tried with a specially-called jury of slaveholders. Interestingly, Brittain Harris, the official who signed the order to hold a trial, was a kinsman of Winifred Cheves, née Harris.

There is no statement that the two female victims actually died from the alleged poisoning. Obviously Taylor was dead at the time of the trial, possibly at a poisoner's hand. It seems certain that Winifred Cheves did pre-decease her husband, whose 19 May 1808 will does not mention her. However, neither she nor Sarah Alford is cited as "deceased" in the first document, as is Etheldred Taylor.
